Alice Kang
POLS/WMNS 338: Women and Politics

No prerequisites

This course searches for women in the political realm. We first question what counts as political. We then examine the exclusion and rise of women in politics. The course also assesses what effects, if any, women have in politics. In surveying women as political actors, this course takes into account the intersectionality of women's multiple identities and the experiences of women in American politics, comparative politics, and international politics. Political science majors and minors may apply to have the class count toward the comparative politics subfield. Students with questions about the course may send an email to the instructor at akang2@unl.edu